Colonization of the Outlying Parts of the Czar's Empire.

With regard to the future colonization of this outlying portion of the empire " the czar, there is no doubt that an anmistakable gain will be derived, for the growth of the population in Siberia, where an area of 13,-400,000 square miles is inhabited by only 7,100,000 sculs, and where the extraordinary wealth in minerals, woods and arable land still awaits exploitation, will certainly proceed with greater strides than heretofors. Without giving implicit faith to Russian official statistical data, it may airly be assumed that, owing to the perticular care the government has always taken as to further colonizaion, the eminently agricultural Russian will probably avail himself of the offered facilities, and that the population in the hitherto empty lands will considerably increase. It may be objected that Russia, the most thinly populated country in Europe, will hardly find a surplue to provide for the newly-opened territory; but it sian peasant is noted for his migratory propensities. And, besides, since the emancipation of serfs in 4861, the agricultural proletariat having steadily grown-the annual amount is computed to be 800,000 men-it is almost certain that it will easily drift in an esstern and southeastern direction, augmenting thereby the total of the population. So far we readily agree with the Russian statistics; but we cannot subscribe to their prophecies as to the quickness and extraordinary high numbers of that growth. The calculation that in the lapse of the next hundred years the above-mentioned area of 1,187,000 square kilometers will have a population of 60,-000,000 or 80,000,000 is certainly exaggerated, and at all events inconsistent with the increase hitherto noticed in more favorably situated and more accessible centers of western Russia. Even in the most fertile districts of southwestern Russia the density of as one reckons upon one square kilometer in France 71.5, in Germany and in Belgium 210 inhabitants, in southern Russia we find only 48.4 .-
